The Midnight Signal

At midnight, the power failed, and radio station KWRN went silent.

“Walter?” June called into the dark. “Are we off the air?”

“Not yet,” Walter grumbled. “There’s an old transmitter in the basement.”

Delphine stormed in. “Nobody touches that thing! It isn’t licensed!”

“People are freezing out there,” June pleaded.

Delphine sighed. “Fine. Do it.”

Moments later, the red lamp glowed. “You’re on!” Walter shouted.

June read the list of shelters. Then the phone rang.

“June, it’s Marcus,” said a deep, warm voice. “A dozen cars stuck on the highway heard you. We’re heading to the church now.”

“Thank you,” June whispered.

Delphine smiled softly. “Worth the fine.”
